“Passionately Pursuing Results”

Are you placing too much trust in the integrity of your staff?

Employee theft is one of the major causes for business failure. Still, many owners and managers fail to audit their employees' activities. Either they don't want to put forth the effort to develop a system of checks and balances or they're afraid they will offend someone by appearing to question their integrity.

We don't want to regard others with suspicion, but keep in mind that most individuals who steal from their companies are trusted right up to the moment they are caught. In other words, you can't be too careful.

The best way to ensure the financial integrity of your business without offending anyone is to establish consistent review procedures at every level. Be diligent, thorough, and fair. Remind employees that these systems are in place to protect them as well as the company. Put the proper safeguards in place and you will avoid allowing your business to be stolen from you.
